In 2008 Susan Daley started work at an animal sanctuary called Wildlife Protection. It is a place that takes care of about 150 wild animals, including lions, tigers and leopards.

Susan was given special training to work with these dangerous animals. Early every morning she gave them food and during the day she took visitors round the sanctuary. After that she cleaned the cages. This work was shared with six other people.

One morning, Susan was cleaning the cage that belonged to Fariq, a six-year-old tiger. She was getting ready to leave when Fariq walked towards her. Susan wasn't scared, but she moved back towards the gate.

Then suddenly Fariq attacked. His long teeth sank into Susan's leg and he started to pull her backwards into the cage. She shouted and tried to open the tiger's mouth. She knew her life was in danger, but she didn't panic and after a few minutes she was able to escape.

Outside the cage, Susan was helped by other workers and an ambulance was called. Her leg was very badly injured and she lost a lot of blood. She was taken to hospital and had to stay there for several weeks.

Now Susan is walking again – and she really wants to get back to work. “That might seem crazy, but I'm so happy when I'm with animals,” she says. She has never thought about leaving the sanctuary. For Susan, working with dangerous animals is the best job in the world.
